CHICAGO IN THE YEAR 2000

ABOUT CITY 2000:

STREET CENSUS was shot as one assignment for Chicago In The Year 2000, a year-long effort to make a photographic document of the city. Eight staff photographers and more than 200 contributors began work at midnight, January 1, 2000, to create an archive that will show people in the year 3000 what our city looks like now. CITY 2000 is a non-profit group privately funded by the Comer Foundation.

Introduction

This is about people watching. These pictures were made with the same impulse that causes some of us to pass time by sitting where there are lots of strangers and just watching them go by. Each is an example of our infinite variety and complexity. Each person is the walking expression of a whole life's story. And altogether, they are the story of a place.

We set up the Deardorff 8x10 view camera in ten different locations around the city, then watched to see who came by. We photographed them (the willing ones) on a white backdrop under daylight. It was endlessly fascinating to see who the sidewalk would bring us next. But it became even more interesting to see what our selected group would come to look like at the end of the day. It was as fun as dipping a net in a stream.

All of us look at people on the street and instantly judge them—even before we've thought about it—by their outward appearances. That's how society operates. Like it or not, how we present ourselves in public is a statement to all; the only choice not possible is to make no statement. This project shows us that appearances do count—they count plenty. And it urges us to ask ourselves how much we're really seeing.

To the viewers of the future, the 8x10 originals will show heaps of minute detail: the wear on a shoe, the hairstyle of the day, the way keys (what were those for?) are held together. For now, these people are just plain interesting. Go ahead and stare. That's what still pictures are for.
